Unlike the eye, the ear has no lead, therefore noise penetrates without protection. Loud noises instinctively signal danger to any organism with a hearing mechanism, including human beings. In response, heart-beat and respiration accelerate. In fact, there is a general increase in the functioning brought about the flow of adrenaline released in response to fear.

Because noise is unavoidable in a complex individual society, we are constantly responding, in the same way that we would respond to danger. Recently researchers have concluded that noise and our response may be much more than annoyance. It may be a serious threat to physical and psychological health and well-being, causing damage not only to the ear and brain but also to the heart and the stomach. We have long known that hearing loss is the country's number one fatal health problem but now we are learning that some of us with heart disease and ulcers may be victims of noise as well.
